Tim Duncan was named the University of New Orleans' Director of Athletics in late April 2019. Duncan joined the Privateers after a year as the deputy athletic director for external affairs at Northeastern University in Boston.

Introduced at a press conference April 30, Duncan is in his first year as the leader of Privateer Athletics.

Within Northeastern University's 18-sport NCAA Division I program, the Memphis native oversaw the external affairs unit, comprised of communications, corporate sponsorships, fundraising, marketing and game day experience, ticket sales and operations, and video production. During his tenure, donations, corporate partnerships and ticket revenue have all increased. In October, Duncan spearheaded a marketing campaign known nationally at #HowlinHuskies, a rebranding of the Northwestern Athletics logos package.

Prior to his time at Northeastern, Duncan worked exclusively in the South. He was director of athletics at Division II Clayton State University in Morrow, Georgia from 2014-2018. He also served as director of athletics at Paine College, a Division II HBCU located in Augusta, Georgia, from 2011-2014.

He was previously an associate athletics director at Division I University of North Carolina Wilmington overseeing the Seahawk Club and the executive director of the M Club, an athletic alumni organization at the University of Memphis.

Prior to entering college athletics administration, Duncan spent 11 years as a marketing professional. Duncan holds a bachelor's of business administration in marketing from Memphis State (now Memphis) and a master's in sports administration from Grambling State. He played four years of college basketball at Memphis.

Duncan is married to Lisa Duncan the former Ms. Lisa Farris. The couple has five children, Lisa, Torin, Tyson Turner and Tatum.
